Early grazing strategies BY CALLA EDWARDS MCLEAN CO. EXTENSION AGENT

With the bromegrass starting to green up this spring, it may be very tempting for you to start turning the cows onto the pasture early this spring, especially if you might be running short of hay, but that practice can come at a cost of production during the regular growing season and can shorten the amount of time your cattle can be on pasture. Grazing before grass plants reach the third leaf stage causes a reduction in herbage production which can reduce stocking rate and animal performance. In western North Dakota, early cool-season native range grasses have their third leaf around June 1. Many livestock operators may be looking for alternatives to feed their animals by late April and May if they have a shortage of harvested feeds. Here are some alternatives, their positive and negative consequences, and techniques to minimize damage to native rangeland:

Alternative 1 Grazing tame grass

pastures in May
This is the best-case scenario to eliminate damage to native rangeland and it still permits turning cattle out on pasture by early May. Tame grass pastures reach grazing readiness two to four weeks earlier than native range, permitting grazing in May and deferring native rangeland grazing until June 1. Livestock producers should graze their tame grass pastures in May, rent tame grass pasture for the month of May, or graze conservation reserve program (CRP) lands in May and June, if they are open for emergency grazing. Crested wheatgrass is the only tame grass pasture ready to be grazed by early May. Smooth bromegrass and meadow bromegrass are typically grazing ready by mid-

May, while most CRP lands and grasses such as intermediate and pubescent wheatgrass are ready for grazing by the third week in May.

Crested wheatgrass and some other cool-season tame grass pastures can provide early spring grazing because the third leaf is reached between 20 April and 10 May, depending on species. Although these grasses may reach the third leaf stage in late April and early May and are physiologically capable of handling grazing pressure, the herbage quantity is too low for high stocking rates. The management decision will be whether to start grazing crested wheatgrass early with moderate stocking rates for the entire spring period or to wait until the first week of May when the growth can keep up with the higher customary stocking rate.

Alternative 2 Continue drylot feeding in May

Many ranchers may not have complementary spring pastures for May grazing. Feeding hay in drylot situations would be the lowestcost scenario compared to grazing native range in May before the grasses reach the third leaf stage.

Most ranchers will be

faced with tough management decisions of whether to turn cattle out on pasture before the grass is ready or to feed harvested forage for a longer period. Grazing before the third leaf stage on native range or tame grass pastures can result in a loss of over 60 percent of the potential forage production when grazing begins in late April and early May and around 45 percent when grazing begins in mid-May. This lost potential production will translate into lost pounds of calf production from those early grazed pastures. Ranchers must consider this loss of calf production when they decide whether to feed hay a little longer or to turn cattle out on pasture before the grass is ready. The costs of feeding harvested forage until crested wheatgrass reaches the third leaf stage will be lower for most situations than will the cost of lost forage and calf production resulting from early grazing. Grazing cool-season tame grass pastures in May will be lower in cost than feeding hay.

Alternative 3 Early grazing native rangeland

Alternative 3 is NOT THE RECOMMENDED STRATEGY. Grazing native rangeland prior to range readiness will be the most costly alternative, with both economical losses (in most cases) and reductions in production associated with physical damage to the plant. Reductions in production result in increased pasture costs and costs per pound of calfgain compared to pastures where the grazing is started after the third leaf stage. Using a rotation system can improve animal performance with increased stocking rates, calf average daily gain, calf gain per acre, and result in improved financial status in the livestock operation. Lost calf gains and increased pasture costs resulting from starting grazing too early are true costs that need to be evaluated against the costs of feeding hay a little longer.

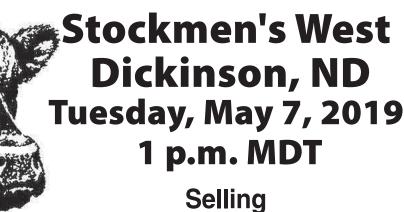

Costs of harvested feed should be evaluated on the number of acres required per cow/calf pair per month and the costs per pound of calf gain on harvested feeds between birth weight and calf weight at pasture turn-out at the threeleaf stage. Producers should evaluate purchased feeds by the cost per pound of calf gain and determine whether this cost is greater than the cost per pound of calf gain on pastures grazed prior to the three-leaf stage. A lactation ration that costs between $0.40 and $0.60 per pound of calf gain would cost less than grazing pastures too early. A lactation ration costing over $0.65 per pound of calf gain should be reformulated.

Ranchers who have exhausted feed supplies and cannot purchase feed or do not have tame grass pastures will need to put their cattle on native rangeland. Producers who have decided this scenario is their only option should follow these guidelines to minimize damage:

1. Use fall pastures not fully grazed in previous year

This technique has many flaws since livestock will still graze any lush new growth first; however, they will also consume some of the old growth from the previous year. The new growth, which is needed for the current year's plant growth, will be high in crude protein content, high in water content (75-80 percent moisture), and low in fiber content. If old growth is not available to provide a dry filler and fiber, cattle will not consume adequate dry matter. For example, a mature 1200 lb cow needs 29 pounds of dry matter per day, and if moisture content is 80 percent, she will need to consume 145 pounds of grass (literally impossible). She will also become loose, and animal performance of both cow and calf will suffer. These early grazed pastures will need to be rested throughout the summer months; however, if grazing is not severe, some light use can occur in the fall. Supplement with grain in this situation.

2. Use summer pastures that are currently rotationally grazed

Once again, this technique will cause damage to native range plants. Summer pastures were probably fully utilized the previous year and minimal old growth remains. These pastures will lack adequate fiber and will not provide sufficient dry matter in early and mid-May. Producers should provide dry supplemental feeds to add dry matter, graze only one pasture of their rotational system early, and allow the remaining pastures to reach grazing readiness before turning out livestock. The pasture grazed early in May will need to be rested the remainder of the grazing season to recover from the severe utilization.

3. Use summer pastures that are grazed season long

This option has the greatest potential to damage native range plants. Once again, this pasture will lack sufficient dry matter in early and mid-May and supplementation with dry feed will be needed. We recommend that producers develop a temporary pasture within their large season long pasture, using electric fencing to form a small pasture for grazing. This developed pasture should include a water source and be easily accessible for supplemental feeding. This technique will cause severe, but localized, damage on a relatively small location while allowing the remainder of the pasture area to reach grazing readiness. Once cattle have been moved to the large section of the pasture, producers should maintain the temporary electric fence to keep the smaller early pasture un-grazed for the remainder of the growing season. This early smaller pasture will recover if provided adequate rest.

Protect your eyes

Do you enjoy the colors of spring, including the sprouting grass and flowering trees? Did you know that your food choices and physical activity levels help you maintain the ability to see clearly and enjoy the colors around you?

Age-related macular degeneration (AMD) is an eye disease affected by lifestyle choices. The macula is an area in the back of our eyes. It's about the size of a capital "O" (in 12-point font). The macula is made up of lutein and zeaxanthin, which are pigments we get from our food. Macular degeneration is one of the leading causes of blindness.

Some risk factors for AMD are not in our control. For example, advancing age, being female, having light skin and/ or blue eyes and having a firstdegree relative with macular degeneration are risk factors we cannot prevent, but eating eye-healthy foods can reduce our risk.

Do you have any of these risk factors for age-related macular degeneration?

• Do vou smoke?

• Do you spend a lot of time in the sun? • Are you sedentary?

• Is your diet low in fruits and vegetables? Throughout our lives, we literally need to feed our eyes with food rich in lutein and zeaxanthin to help maintain the macula's function. Spinach, kale, collard greens, broccoli, peas, kiwi, oranges, mangoes, orange peppers and corn are notable sources of lutein and/ or zeaxanthin.

Looking back on nutrition and other trends in the last 40 years

BY JULIE GARDEN-ROBINSON FOOD AND NUTRITION SPECIALIST

NDSU EXTENSION

Where were you in 1979?

I know some of my readers were adults at the time; others were teens or children. Others weren't born vet.

We recently celebrated the 40th birthday of the North Dakota Nutrition Council at the annual conference. Our keynote speaker, Judi Adams, who retired from the Wheat Foods Council, walked us through decades of changes in nutrition recommendations.

Trust me: Much has changed in the last four decades in popular culture, daily conveniences and nutrition recommendations.

People had only a few TV channels to choose from in 1979. "Mork and Mindy," "Happy Days," "Laverne and Shirley," "Little House on the Prairie," "Dallas" and "The Love Boat" were among the most popular programs. Do you remember rabbit ears and aluminum foil?

Of course, cellphones weren't in everyone's hands. In 1979, we were lucky if we had a long phone cord on the only phone in the house.

You couldn't take a photo with your phone and upload it to Facebook to share with your friends immediately. You had to send film away to be developed, and you hoped people had their eyes open in the photos when you received the prints in the

The Sony Walkman was introduced in 1979 with a hefty price tag for the time: $150. We didn't have ear buds and YouTube.

Most people were wearing a lot of polyester back 40 years ago. Men, did you have a leisure suit or two? Oh, admit it. Your dad and grandpa probably did, anyway.

Those polyester knit clothes probably look as good as new if you found them in a closet

In 1979, "Superman the Movie" was launched, along with "Rocky II," the "Muppet Movie" and "Star Trek: The Motion Picture." The Bee Gees, Rod Stewart, Blondie, Gloria Gaynor and Michael Jackson were popular.

Time flies, doesn't it?

We certainly weren't ordering "Uber Eats" with an app on our cellphone. Eating out was a big treat for most families four decades ago, and coffee houses did not dot the landscape of urban America, beckoning us with caloric lattes and mochas.

Special "kid food" didn't emerge until McDonald's Happy Meals were introduced in 1979. Of course, we weren't taking pictures of our restaurant meal and Snap-chatting or Tweeting it to our friends.

Restaurant portions were much smaller in 1979, too. Most people were smaller as well. Despite smaller waistlines, fad diets were popular then, as they are now. In 1979, the Atkins diet was popular, as was the Scarsdale diet. Neither gets two thumbs up from nutrition experts, then or now.

Back then, nutrition research pointed toward recommending low-fat diets. Now our messages point to choosing healthful fats, not necessarily fat-free foods. Eating less salt was a focus in 1979, and it remains as a focus in 2019.

Carbs were considered "bad" by some in 1979, and some people shun carbs today, too. However, people who eat lowcarb diets may be lacking in several vitamins and minerals, and their diet choices may have adverse effects on their heart, muscles, kidneys and other organs.

Forty years ago, eggs were on the "bad" list due to their cholesterol content. More recently, cholesterol restrictions were removed, and now nutrition experts are debating the best level of dietary cholesterol that is most things.

Many things have changed, but some things have stayed the same. We in nutrition still are trying to get everyone to eat more fruits and vegetables because 90 percent of adults shortchange themselves on the recommendation (4 1/2 cups fruits and vegetables daily).

If you are looking for a healthful diet to follow, remember two diets: The Mediterranean diet and DASH (Dietary Approaches to Stop Hypertension) diet are considered among the top diets that promote health today.

These are the key messages from the most recent national nutrition guidance available at https://www.choosemyplate. gov/. Which ones do you achieve on most days?

* Make half your plate fruits and vegetables: vary your veggies and focus on whole fruits.

* Make half your grains whole grains.

* Vary your protein routine. Make one-fourth of your plate

* Move to low-fat or fat-free milk or yogurt.

* Drink water instead of sugary drinks.

The other morning, I listened to radio announcers talking about a food trend from the last several years: meals in a bowl. I'm not talking about soup.

A meal in a bowl consists of layers of ingredients, which vou can set up as a "create vour own meal" buffet with several options for a family gathering.

Instead of a recipe, we will get a little creative this week with some basics from an NDSU Extension handout. For a printable copy, see www. ag.ndsu.edu/pubs/yf/foods/ fn1757.pdf.
