Take 20 paces, turn and fire had it's time and place

In the early years of the United States, politicians settled personal disputes like gentlemen (no ladies in those days) and would take up pistols, take 20 paces, turn and fire. The idea being one or both would be killed or maimed, thus settling who was superior. Either people decided it was uncivilized to act that way, or politicians lost their guts for settling things by shooting guns and went to shooting off their mouths with no fear of recourse. We see a lot of that these days and not just in politics. You could say we have become civilized but undignified. These days, a politician will fire off a round from the mouth calling an adversary some demeaning nickname, shaming them from their size to their hairstyle. Then, we wring our hands and wonder what is happening to the younger generations!

Wouldn't it be interesting if the people could get together and pass an initiated measure which would amend the law at all levels and require that any disputes that require name calling would now require a duel, thus settling things once and for all. Instead of pistols, we could mandate that AR-15s be used, since the government should have a lot of those if they can force us to sell them to the government.

Judging by how nasty things have gotten, the grave-digger business would probably be as populated as the political business. Politicians would add a new meaning to "breaking new ground." If people flock to Trump rallies now, imagine the crowds to see a Trump shootout!

A couple scenarios come to my twisted mind. Trump versus Bernie Sanders. They both take 20 paces and turn. Bernie looks at the gun in his and asks, "What was I supposed to do now?" "Bang!" End of that story.

And, Liz Warren would likely insist on using a bow and arrow, rather than a gun, to reinforce her claims of being a Native American. Speaking as a Native, I'd use a harpoon, if it were me. An arrow would just be too small for a critter with a blow hole that size. Geez! Now they got me doing it.

TRACKS IN THE SAND

Looking back over it, two party politics may have always been a snarled ball of personality conflicts hiding behind what we like to call "the peoples' work." We often hear the claim, aka "defense" that something isn't "personal." If it involves "persons," believe me, it has some degree of being "personal." It may be strictly business, as is often claimed, but you have to dig down and find out what kind of business it really is.

I've said this here before, but it bears repeating, cause it matters, not because my memory is bad. Part of the problem is this. Years ago, when there were far less means of mass communication, the primary source was newspapers. They like to dub themselves the "Kingmakers." Later the title would be shared and contested by all the options we see today. Those who control the message are in control. It still is that way, which is why you see news and information sources aligned with certain politics and the people engaged in that. Just like at the betting windows, people are trying to pick a winner by promoting the contestants.

We may not want to go back to dueling with weapons but back to some semblance of the basics would be nice and likely helpful in restoring dignity, civility and common sense decency to how we ask for the work doing the people's work.

Call me a cynic and a skeptic, if you will. However, I would have you ask yourself why anyone would spend millions and billions and make huge personal sacrifices only to be a servant of the public. There has to be a worthwhile payday there and frankly, these people lose all sense of grace and humility to the people once we put them there. Not all but most, in my guess.

If one's legacy is determined by the power of one's enemies, it would seem that America has not had a war for some time, where our enemies were powerful enough to create a legacy for any of our national leaders. Where are the commanding figures who, yes, commanded the respect of even their domestic enemies and critics. After all the death and disfigurement and wealth squandered, we have little to show and our enemies thumb their noses and challenge us.

If we believe the story of King David, a boy who defined his legacy by dropping a giant with a stone fired from a sling, after which he used the giant's own sword to cut off his head, we might wonder how the news and the kingmakers and the hopefuls would spin that action today. What nickname for the news might he be given today? If I heard the story right, David actually took five rocks with him because it was rumored there was more than one giant. How many rocks does a person need today? Maybe, the movie character Forrest Gump was right when he noted, "Sometimes, there just aren't enough rocks." Yep.
