Unharvested corn can be feed for cattle

BY CALLA EDWARDS MCLEAN CO. EXTENSION AGENT

The 2019 growing season has not been conducive for corn grain production in many areas of the northern Plains.

The late planting season, combined with cooler temperatures, has left many fields unharvestable or not cost effective for harvesting corn for grain, especially with late-season varieties. Alternative uses for corn include grazing, chopping it, harvesting as earlage or harvesting high-moisture corn and using it for livestock feed.

However, producers must

State University Extension a brief learning period, cattle livestock specialists say.

Grazing standing corn

"When grazing standing corn with cobs that are filled with grain, the grazing has to be managed to reduce any risk of causing health issues and even death to livestock," cautions Kevin Sedivec, Extension rangeland management specialist.

"Consuming too much grain can cause digestive upsets (acidosis), lameness, abortions, and death in extreme cases. Some issues will develop through time, making them difficult to will graze corn ears if any have developed. However, the cattle first need to adapt to a higher grain diet; otherwise, acidosis or other digestive disorders could develop.

'It is important to control the amount of corn and forage to which the animals have access," says Miranda Meehan, Extension livestock environmental stewardship specialist. "You can effectively do this by cross-fencing or grazing in controlled strips. This technique will reduce high overload of grain and waste through trampling.

Cross-fencing and strip-grazing are usually recommended with access to no more than a two-day supply of fresh corn at a time; a one-day supply is even better, especially for younger, growing cattle," she adds. "If you cannot limit feed grazing animals in standing corn, this option is not recommended because the risk for high death loss is great."

A basic rule of thumb for determining two days' worth of feed is that each acre of standing corn that is about 6 feet tall and tasseled should provide enough grazing for about 125 to 150 cows for one day. Observe animal behavior and the amount of grazeable corn each day, as well as in-field variations, to determine whether to increase or decrease the area allotted with each new grazing strip.

back to water. Producers can mitigate the risk of grazing standing corn by:

• Carefully considering the class of cattle allowed to graze cornstalks. Cattle new to eating corn (calves or yearlings) will take some time before they actively seek corn. This delayed consumption can serve as a good acclimation period (or explain the suddenly dead calf after being on the corn field for two weeks). Cows with experience grazing corn will look for grain and ears immediately when turned out. Consider grazing calves, yearlings or cull cows on fields to clean up some of the corn before turning out pregnant cows.

• Adapting cattle to corn before turning out to graze corn stalks. Start with 3 pounds daily and move up to 7 or 8 pounds during a 10-day period before turnout.

Cross-fencing fields to minimize the amount of the field that cows have access to at any one time. Early in the grazing period, this may mean moving the fence daily. Then progress to two-day moves.

• Not turning hungry cattle out to graze. Provide goodquality hay for two to three days so cattle don't overeat corn immediately. Cows experienced in eating ear corn will shell it off the cob.

Watching t h e concentration of corn kernels in manure because as the amount of whole corn kernels in the manure decreases, the feed value in the field is decreasing. When you no longer find whole corn kernels in the manure, the cows will need supplemental feed or to be moved to new grazing.

Chopping corn

Corn still can be chopped for feed, but achieving "true" silage likely will be impossible without adding water to the pile. Because most of North Dakota has experienced a killing freeze, the corn will be too dry to harvest as silage.

"The whole corn plant is probably running at 25-45 percent moisture, and even up to 60 percent, so harvesting as silage is still an option,' says Karl Hoppe, Extension livestock systems specialist at NDSU's Carrington Research Extension Center.

"Silage that is below the recommended moisture content (65-75 percent) still should be chopped finer and packed repeatedly to remove as much oxygen from the pile, but it will not fully ferment; thus it is susceptible to spoilage.'

Inoculates may be beneficial in speeding the onset of fermentation. Using products containing oxygen eliminators may enhance oxygen elimination. Silage piles should be covered with two-ply plastic to decrease spoilage and maintain the longevity of the pile.

Producers also have chopped corn that was frozen and stored frozen," Hoppe notes. "This feed, if it remains frozen, will make good feed. However, frozen whole-plant chopped corn, when it thaws, will spoil next spring. So plan to harvest only what you can feed this winter season."

Corn as earlage Earlage is ensiled corn grain, cobs and, in some cases, husks and a portion of the stalk. Earlage allows the production of a relatively high-energy feed product, which can be harvested, stored and fed much like corn silage, using the same types of equipment used to produce corn silage.

It is higher in energy than corn silage with similar protein content, but it has lower energy than dry or highmoisture corn grain. Earlage is harvested at 35-40 percent moisture and packed and stored like silage. At harvest, cob material will be higher in moisture than grain. With earlage, the biggest problem usually is harvesting the corn when it is too dry.

Earlage can be harvested several ways. Many custom forage chopping operations have equipment to produce good-quality earlage. The most common harvesting method is a snapper head on a forage harvester with a kernel processor so that just the ear, cob and husk are harvested.

Earlage can be stored in bunkers, trenches and plastic silage bags. However, whatever storage method is used, oxygen must be limited. Earlage is denser than corn silage; consequently, ensuring that your unloading equipment and storage facility can handle the extra weight prior to filling is important. For more information, see the NDSU Extension publication "Harvesting, Storing and Feeding Corn as Earlage" (tinyurl.com/Earlage).

High-moisture corn

High-moisture corn offers many advantages for producers who feed beef or dairy cattle. However, successfully using high-moisture corn requires attention to harvest timing, processing, storage conditions and feeding management.

High-moisture corn is corn harvested at 24 percent or greater moisture (maximum 40 percent moisture), stored and allowed to ferment in a silo or other storage structure, and used as feed for livestock.

This type of corn should be processed (ground or rolled) prior to storage, Hoppe says. Grinding or rolling and subsequent packing of the corn facilitates oxygen exclusion. The goal with processing should be to have no more than 5 percent fines and no more than 5 percent whole kernels.

For feeding purposes, rolling is the preferred method of processing (compared with grinding) because rolling will result in less fines and lower probability of acidosis due to rapid fermentation when feeding.

percent, water may need to be added to facilitate packing and fermentation. A good rule of thumb is to add 3.5 gallons of water per ton of corn for each percentage point the corn is below 27 percent moisture.

'This is the best option for large volumes of corn harvested in a short period of time but will require a largevolume roller or hammer mill to process grain rapidly," says Janna Block, livestock systems specialist at NDSU's Hettinger Research Extension Center. "Packing is done with tractors, which may be equipped with a dozer blade or front-end loaders.

"During feed out, the face of the bunker must be kept fresh High-moistureCorn).

to avoid heating, so the width of the high-moisture corn bunker should match the rate of use," she says. "Bunkers constructed of a cement base and sides will reduce spoilage better than earthen structures and provide a firm surface for equipment throughout the year.

The specialists also recommend that producers take care when feeding highmoisture corn because it has a faster ruminal digestion rate than dry corn.

Consequently, better bunk management typically is required for successful feeding. For more information, see the publication "Harvesting, Storing and Feeding Highmoisture Corn" (tinyurl.com/

Plan for long-term care

BY MICHELLE EFFERTZ 4-H YOUTH EXTENSION AGENT

No one wants to envision spending their later years living in a nursing home or being dependent on the help of others to live at home, yet most Americans will need long-term care at some point in their lives.

Planning for long-term care needs is crucial for financial security and peace of mind. Long-term care is an umbrella term for services and supports designed to help people live independently on a daily basis, such as eating, bathing and dressing, either in a care facility or one's home. A misconception is that health insurance, Medicare or disability insurance cover these services, but they do not.

term care services, but you only qualify if your income and assets do not exceed levels set by your state. You can purchase long-term care insurance, annuities or other hybrid or combination products. The

Resources available for assisting with farm stress

With crops unable to be harvested, hay sitting in floodwaters and livestock either still in the pasture or already on feed, farm and ranch stress is impacting communities across the state. But local community groups and individuals have offered a helping hand.

"There are some wonderful community support groups, clergy and other individuals who have stepped up to assist others in this time of need. It truly is people helping people," Agriculture Commissioner Doug Goehring said. "With needs increasing, these groups and individuals are feeling the toll and are looking for more resources.'

Groups and individuals

To start the planning process, here are some important steps:

 Think about your ultimate goals for where you want to live and how you will receive care, should vou need it.

• Consider your unique needs, such as risk factors for long-term care. Risk factors include age, gender, disability, health status and living situation.

• Understand the range of long-term care services and supports, including home care, adult day care, assisted living and nursing homes.

• Do the research so you know the costs of long-term care services in your community.

• Determine what financial resources you have to cover long-term care and address any gaps in financing before you need it.

The best time to plan is when you are healthy and have time to plan. The earlier, the better, just like with financial retirement planning. Planning for long-term care needs is not just about you. It is really a family plan because it impacts the lives of those who care about you, too.

Xtra | 11.04.2019 | 5 POINTERS FOR POINT

BY NICK SIMONSON DAKOTA OUTDOORS

Hunting upland birds behind a pointing dog can provide some of the biggest thrills in the outdoors. Few moments stand out in the fall like a quivering tail on a rock-solid dog holding just inches from an unseen bird buried in the grass. The tension and anticipation coming from those memorable seconds over fifteen years behind two pointing labs has not waned for me, and my heart still jumps into my throat as the word "steady" works its way out in as calm and low of a voice as I can muster to reassure my dog that I am on my way to see what he's pinned down.

However, connecting on a pointed and flushed bird can be more challenging than it seems, and even a decade and a half down the road, a miss or two still makes it into my hunting journal when recapping what seemed like a sure thing.

Know how it ends

The end result is often fiftyfifty on hens or roosters flushing (though it may seem like hens are the primary offering some days), or sometimes it's a group of birds like grouse, partridge or young of the year pheasants that are bunched up at the end of an area of cover.

Whatever the situation, the moment of pause that points provide gives hunters a chance to get set up for the shot and to convert whatever is being held in check.

Some pointers are trained to allow the hunter to flush the bird and some, like my dogs, have been trained to release on a command and send their quarry into the sky. Knowing your dog – or the dog you may be hunting with - and how they release the bird from their point is as important as what comes after the flush.

In the time leading up to that moment, getting in position is crucial, knowing that a skittish pheasant may burst from cover at any time on the approach. Move quickly, but calmly, reassuring the dog only as needed and doing so in a hushed voice if possible or necessary. While the field mount pattern I have developed over the years does not release the safety on the gun until the stock hits my shoulder, and I don't raise the gun until the bird hits the skyline and is clear of the dog and any obstructions in the distance, I have seen many others be fully or partially mounted as they come up behind their pointer. Find the pattern that works for you, and continue to develop it this fall and in the seasons to come.

Continue to keep safety and awareness of your surroundings while you prepare for the shot, and be aware of the behaviors of the dog holding nearby, which may jump or pursue the bird after the flush, depending on age, breed or training level. If the dog isn't yours or you're not familiar with it, it is important to ask the owner about what to expect on a point before entering the field, so you can be ready and safe.

Know the shot

With all the excitement and anticipation building up to the flush, it's possible to rush the shot, prematurely fire and miss the bird entirely. Remember to breathe on approach to the point, taking a deep calming breath and thinking about what's to come in a manner that relies on previous experience and a positive mindset of converting the point to a flush, to a mounted gun, to a shot, to a bird in the bag.

While the visualized ideal scenario is rarely what results, something similar to it often does, and the chain of events may not differ much from what actually happens. Positivity and mental preparation, even in just that second or two before the moment of truth, goes a long way toward converting in any situation, including hunting.

Additionally, as part of that preparation, knowing your shotgun, choke tubes and the load you're shooting is important in connecting with a pointed and flushed bird. In my younger days, when I shot a single-barreled pump gun, I usually utilized a modified choke in early fall and a full choke later in the season. I could take down far-flushing birds in December, and often did.

However, having hunted behind a pointing dog and enjoying those moments even more as what I seek from my hunting experience has changed over time, even if some birds flush wild, I'll often hold off on rangy roosters and wait for a point, or a closer-flushing bird, and utilize an improved cylinder in my first barrel and modified

Knowing the habits of a pointing dog in the field, how birds will likely flush and the specifics of your gun, choke and patterning will help put more pheasants and other upland game on the tailgate at the end of the trail. NICK SIMONSON

I know that this more open combination provides a wider pattern which helps me connect better with pointed pheasants which even in late season flush closer to me. Even with those close-flushing birds, it's important to let the knowledge of the dog, your firearm and load, and with the mindset that each shot presents a chance that you can and will convert on.

shot set up to the pattern of the shell and choke tubes being used.

A rooster shot at 5 yards with any gun is often turned into hamburger if it gets hit, but more often is missed as the pattern is too narrow. With many specialty upland loads designed to carry out to effective ranges of 40 or 50 yards, it may take longer and seem counterintuitive to let the bird get out, but it's likely you have a second or two to let the situation develop and the bird to wing it into the ideal shooting range.

Having this factor covered in your point-to-shot itinerary comes down to patterning your shotgun ahead of the hunt and learning to judge distance effectively. The former takes about 15 minutes at a shooting range, the latter may take months or years, and certainly can be affected by adrenaline and excitement on any given day. Prepare for the point with
