Fishing the real cause of Custer's death

Since the battle at Little Big Horn in 1876, folks have sought to unravel the mystery of why General George Armstrong Custer lead his cavalry troops to their deaths at the hands of Natives. Many have concluded it was simply a vanity issue. I suspect it was more than that. I think the problem took root in fishing.

Let's assume the general loved to fish. But, since he was a general and tasked with listening to settlers and gold diggers complain and bossing Indians around, he didn't have a lot of spare time. So, he began soliciting scouting reports from his men who would return to Fort Lincoln with all kinds of big fish. In order to go fishing, he would have to agree to take his wife, Libby, on a picnic, which would allow him to get a line in the water.

After a few dozen picnics, which resulted in numerous romantic interludes and the general gaining 20 pounds from eating all that fried chicken and potato salad, he still hadn't gotten lucky. Sitting in his office one sunny afternoon, giving it a think, it came to him. He simply couldn't trust scouting reports. If someone said they were catching fish at a certain spot using minnows for bait, they clearly meant another place 10 miles up or downstream using worms. Threatening his men with the direst of consequences for failing to give up their information wasn't working. While basking in his superior intellect, his aide walked in and told him that Washington had sent a note ordering him to ride out to Montana and deal with an Indian problem, although it is not clear the Indians really had a problem.

The general gathered his troops, promised Libby the Mother of all Picnics upon his return and kissed her goodbye. Upon reaching the area of the Little Bighorn River in eastern Montana, Custer called in his Indian scouts to make a plan. The scouts relayed that there were about 10,000 Indians from several tribes camped on the river, just a couple miles away. When his Native scouts began taking off their army uniforms, putting on their traditional garb and singing their death songs, Custer was certain it was another false scouting report, as such reports were often accompanied by a measure of drama. What the scouts really meant, he was certain of from his own superior deductions, was that there were about 50 old men, women, and children camped about 10 miles away. If he rode hard, he could be all done with it and back to Ft. Lincoln before the summer bite was over.

Rallying his troops, Custer jumped on his horse and ordered the charge. Upon looking down at the huge gathering of Indians, his thought was: Boy, the fish must really be biting in that spot! I'm sure this story is accurate because I heard it from a guy, who heard it from a guy, who heard it from a guy.

Like General Custer, I am a very busy guy. So, I tend to ask guys who are catching lots of big fish where they're fishing, what rigs they're using, what kind of bait, and so on. Knowing, of course, I can't trust them.

A second chance for a big game prize

By John Bradley, NDWF Executive Director

While most of us have been more tuned in to big game hunting applications this spring or hitting the water for walleye, the recent stay-at-home order gave me a chance to organize some gear, too.

Picking my way through a year of fishing and hunting equipment, my thoughts swirled around one activity: elk hunting. Even as I write this, I am kicking myself for not organizing my elk gear after my last move. It's easy to understand why, as I have my North Dakota once-in-alifetime elk tag in my pocket and know the work that goes into successfully hunting elk. We all have hunting and fishing experiences that feed an aching passion and drive us onward to the next season, and my most recent experience is the fuel for this fall's fire.

I last punched an elk tag when I lived in Montana; a beautiful six-by-six bull elk with dark antlers. The area had healthy elk numbers, and I knew that if I put the miles in, I would eventually find a herd. We were in the foothills of the mountain, hoping that the activity of the first week of rifle season had moved elk around as hunters moved in and out of the area.

I've also found another activity during down times that fuels my passion for the outdoors – conservation advocacy. And, I know, there is already an overwhelming stream of online advocacy clawing its way through your social media channels, e-mail boxes and digital forums. Making sense of it all can be daunting.

If you haven't visited the North Dakota Wildlife Federation's website recently, however, I'm certain you will be pleased. Most of the big issues affecting North Dakota's hunters and anglers can be found at www. northdakotawildlife.org and ways to easily become engaged. From public lands issues, to conservation funding, recreation infrastructure, the Legislative Session and more, the legislative front and state and federal actions have not slowed, despite the recent downtime. It is a great website and a noble place to further your engagement in things that matter to sportsmen.

But back to the elk..

The fall won't come quick enough for me. And relishing in that last Montana elk hunt keeps me going. How could it not? The draws, coulees and creeks were loaded with deer, elk, and bear sign. Each track confirmed that the spot was where I needed to be. I was able to harvest a great bull and had two friends who were willing to stop their hunt and help pack it out with me. There is nothing like a four-mile hike with your pack loaded down and your legs screaming to make you thankful for ibuprofen. In fact, Advil should advertise in hunting magazines.

It took me a couple of hours to get in range of the bull. I had spotted him over a mile off; tucked into the hillside and protected from the icy rain that had started to fall. I moved in slowly, cautious of the wind, worried that one swirl would send my scent and the bull would run out of my life (and out of this story). When I finally got within distance of the elk, I centered the scope on my 7mm Remington Magnum behind his shoulder, and after a couple of steadying breaths, slowly squeezed the trigger.

The crack of the rifle had the elk up and moving, but only for a second. After about 15 yards he rolled down the hill before wedging in some undergrowth. Then the real work began. I sent a text off to my hunting partners saying I'd be late for our midday meet up and started breaking down the bull. Multiple hours later, I arrived back at camp and recruited my friends for some "Type 2 fun." With their help we were able to get all the meat out and cooled down quickly. They earned every slice of pizza and cold beer that I bought for them when the hunt was over.

So, I sit here, planning my next elk hunt this fall – securing the time and hoping travel will be less complicated than it is today. In the meantime, I'll be getting in shape for this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. And when I'm in the Federation office, I'll do all I can to ensure we have access and good habitat for hunting and fishing by advocating as a sportsman and using my voice.

John Bradley is the Executive Director of the North Dakota Wildlife Federation and a Dakota Edge Outdoors Contributing Writer.

Four Advanced Takeaways From Fisheries Surveys

BY NICK SIMONSON

As agencies sample the waters throughout the upper Midwest this summer, the reports they generate show that not only is the government in action for the betterment of the angling public, but it is also helping to provide vital clues which assist anglers in their efforts after the fish that can be found in the various lakes and reservoirs across the map. Getting beyond the numbers of walleyes, bass, or bluegills is what advanced anglers do to find the colors and presentations that work, and help transfer information from other experiences to catch more fish, bigger fish, and the fish they want to keep. What follows are those advanced items that can be gleaned with a little bit of digging into the numbers of any given survey report and how the statistics can translate to success on the water.

PREDATOR AND PREY

Looking at a list of fish can easily show what's in the water and what anglers might expect to catch, but going a bit deeper helps anglers connect those game fish on the report with other species in the water which they might eat throughout the summer. An abundance of small white bass, yellow perch, or even rough fish like bullheads and suckers can provide valuable clues as to what walleyes, pike and largemouth are lunching on. Establishing a predatorand-prey relationship from the survey results is a good thing to know, especially when it comes to catching those bigger species.

GET CONFIDENT

With that food structure in mind, it's easy to turn to the tacklebox and pick out those baits that have a better chance of connecting with gamefish by imitating their prey right off the launch. With realistic paint schemes on modern crankbaits designed to match a bluegill or perch scale-for-scale, and even just selecting the basic silver, gold, or colored spinner blade based on what's getting eaten, anglers can pick out a few hues to troll and try on a new water which they've researched. It's likely that a perch or firetiger pattern will pay off on those waters with yellow perch present, and purples, blues and oranges will help imitate sunnies that are maturing in the flow, providing confidence colors from the outset. Even the average size of an offering can be considered, and a bigger model of bait or oversized blade can be utilized if both the predators and their meals are a bit larger on the survey results.

TIME IT RIGHT

Most agencies will also provide a historical stocking list going back several years to help give anglers more insight on what is in the water, and possibly an estimate of how many fish from a certain species are there. With an understanding of how fast fish grow in a certain area, or similar lake types across a region, it's easy to extrapolate stocking data a few years out, and know those walleyes that were placed as fry in 2016 are likely getting into the quality eatersized category by now. Looking over stocking reports and comparing them with what was sampled in a survey can also confirm those suspicions as to what size structure is present.

TARGET ACQUISITION

With information on species type, size and abundance it's easier to tailor efforts to desired results. If looking for a shot at a trophy fish, an angler need only look to the far end of the size spectrum on a series of lakes to find where bigger fish are swimming. For those looking to fill the livewell and fulfill the family wishes for a Friday night fish fry, a bigger population of eater-sized fish - be they crappies, perch, walleye or others - is something to look for in the numbers. When just looking for action, it's easy to select those lakes with good bass, pike or panfish populations to provide a steady tug on the line or a repeatedly disappearing slip float to keep things interesting. Mix the numbers with a state record list to confirm the best option to break the current bests, with the addition of some searching and some hard work, of course.

THE GRAND EXPERIMENT

As a facet of the combined art and science that is modern angling, learning how to read, and more importantly, utilize the information contained in fisheries surveys will help test theories, tweak presentations and develop new ideas into successful patterns on the water. While the correlation may not be one-to-one as an angler jumps from lake-to-lake, some of that knowledge transfers and the process of researching a water, knowing what is swimming and who's eating whom below the surface, can help perfect a presentation and make it modifiable for fish of all sizes and species. Take a few extra minutes to arrange the pieces of the puzzle provided by survey reports this summer and those from seasons past to get a better picture on angling success.

What Lies Beneath. Knowing what is in a water, and using that data to assemble a plan to fish it more effectively, can come from examining fishery survey results. Take some time and put the pieces of the puzzle together with information assembled by agencies doing the sampling. Simonson Photo.

TRACKS... .....Continued from page 6

Just the other weekend, I asked one of my favorite sources those questions. He immediately replied that he was fishing on the fence line, pulling spinners, and using worms. What kind of fool did he take me for! Too quick and too easy. So, I spent some time wandering around the bait shop, complaining about his prices, asking about tackle items still in the imaginary phase of development, and slandering his bait. His story never changed and, although he was slumped behind his counter with a run over dog look from all my abuse, I still knew that what he really meant was that he was fishing 25 miles west near an island pitching jigs with minnows. Some people can't be fooled.

The trip back to the boat dock was long, rough, and I arrived with zero fish and feeling just a bit crabby. While getting unloaded, several fishermen arrived and began unloading pails of big walleyes. I had to ask. Yep, they'd been fishing by the fence line, pulling spinners with worms. Caught four limits in less than an hour.

And that is how you come to know how Custer felt.
