Top Story

Hello,
I have a friend. Well, hopefully more than one. But I have one friend who stops to visit every couple weeks. Now, I don't mind visiting, but this guy always has one of those stories that top anything I can say or do. In fact, if the news happens to be on, he can top any news story that he happens to hear.

Well, the other day he stopped by for a cup of coffee and the news was on about the human trafficking problem in North Dakota. A serious problem. But as soon as the news ended, he began telling me his tale of woe.

It seems he has been shopping at the local WalMart store. He said the prices are reasonable and it is close to his home. Then he told me of the strange happenings in the parking lot.

It seems there are a couple of girls working the lot. They wait for a lone man to come out to his vehicle and they approach him. Now they are attractive young ladies and dressed for a hot summer day. Not the coveralls and winter clothes we Dakotans are accustomed to. They explain that they would like a ride down to the new McDonalds (the one with the double line). Having heard there was work there, they would like to apply.

HAT TIPS

Now here is where it gets interesting. As he drives out of the lot, one of the girls slid over to him and started nibbling on his ear. Then she slips her hand in his shirt and starts rubbing his chest. Now, my friend tells me, while you are distracted, the other girls steals your wallet!

When I said I really doubted that this would happen, he exclaimed loudly that it had. He said it happened two weeks ago on Wednesday and Thursday. It happened twice on Saturday, and again yesterday morning. He was hoping it would happen twice today.

He explained that the good part was he had found you could buy billfolds for $2.99 at Walmart, and for $.99 at the Dollar store! I don't know. I wouldn't ever call a man a liar, but it seemed a little far fetched. A little short this week. Borrowed computer from a neighbor and in a hurry! Later- Dean

Weed work advise for the summer gardener

By Nick Simonson

While midsummer brings its share of weeds to front lawns and gardens requiring some time on the hands and knees cleaning things up, or at least a quick buzz of the tiller in a skillful weaving around those tomato plants, there's other weed work that can be much more enjoyable. This time of the season also brings well-established weedlines into play for fish that utilize them for protection from the stronger and longer-lasting rays of the sun and find the bountiful food web that is developing along with the underwater foliage. Anglers are wise to explore these areas to increase their summer success, and target the various edges created by summer weeds to get the most out of their efforts.

AN ASIDE

The most obvious edge created by an established summer weedline is the deepwater edge. Where the green wall ends and open water begins is where many fish seek out their prey. Minnows, aquatic insects and other food items congregate along this edge where predators of all sizes can most easily patrol. Thus, the outer edge is often the best place to start the exploration of a weedline and can be done with relative ease through the use of offerings both fast and slow. Spinnerbaits and crankbaits can be ripped along the open water immediately adjacent to the weedline to cover water and trigger reaction strikes of those fish positioned along the structure. Bends and turns in the edge can be explored with jigs, plastics and other precision baits that can be worked slowly in these pockets which often hold fish. Think of the weeds as an edge which schooling fish like white bass and crappies can pin schools of minnows up against.

POCKETED

While the expanse of a weedline or a heavily vegetated area may seem uniform, there are often pockets and openings created by varied lake bottoms that don't facilitate growth in certain areas, or structures such as rocks and boulders prohibit weed growth. As a result, these are prime areas for anglers to target for those fishing lying in wait for an easy meal. Dropping a Texas-rigged tube into those openings for bass is a classic summer tactic, while working a baited jig in these spaces can pay off on walleye lakes where the wary fish lurks in the shadows cast by the vegetation. Certainly, panfish like bluegills and perch use these openings as well, and a simple jig-and-crawler offering will connect anglers with fast fun when such a space is identified.

OVER THE TOP

Places where weeds mat up on the surface can make angling difficult, but where they allow for some space to retrieve a lure over their tops – whether it's just a shorter stand of sand grass in the shallows, or thicker cabbage in the depths – anglers can burn a bait over the top of them to trigger a reaction strike. As the stand of weeds tapers and angles out toward the depths, the retrieve rate can be slowed and the lure worked a bit deeper to find fish in the decreasing cover. Many predator species like pike and bass, and even wall-eyes will dart up from their resting spots and smash an offering moving quickly over their position.

BACK EDGE

Many anglers overlook the shallow stretch located behind a well established stand of summer weeds, but especially in low light conditions, it's worth a look. In areas with shoreline rip-rap leading down to the weedline through the shallows, it's common to find summer smallmouth bass snapping up crayfish and small minnows. Work tubes, jigs and weedless plastic options for bronzebacks. Additionally, these shallows are often home to big bluegills, and exploring the inside edge often results in continuous action and a chance at some real bulls lurking along it.

VARIETY

Weed types can vary from lake to lake, and even across different sections of a single water body. Each variety provides unique cover for fish and fishing options for anglers. Make it a point to identify those different stands of vegetation on the lakes and those places where the right cover, food web and travel lanes come together for fish through the establishment of solid summer stands of weeds, and explore them with a variety of lure and bait options for the best success, noting that composition can change from season-to-season based on water conditions such as clarity and temperature. Make a note in a fishing journal, and drop a marker on a GPS of those places where it all comes together for great fishing, with a little bit of weed work in the heart of summer.

Milking It for Monarchs

By Nick Simonson

Imagine having to choose just one food to live off for half of your life. While I'm certain fried walleye would be a good option, or pizza would work, or even wild rice brats fresh off the grill could sustain about anyone, the hedging exhibited just in this sentence alone shows how difficult it would be. Now imagine you're a monarch butterfly, and you don't have a choice. From birth through its caterpillar phase, the iconic butterfly depends on one food source for all its needs to reach its most noted black-and-orange adult appearance – milkweed.

The decline in monarch butterflies has been well noted in recent years, as over the past two decades, populations throughout North America have plummeted precipitously. As tracked by the World Wildlife Federation, in 1996 more than one billion estimated monarch butterflies overwintered in dense clusters on more than 44 acres of their historic migratory destinations in the oyamel fir forests of the limited mountainous regions in central Mexico, about 60 miles from the nation's capital of Mexico City. By 2017, those populations dwindled to around 150 million butterflies occupying a mere 6.12 acres of their historical wintering sites in the region. An all-time low in the organization's tracking of the migration from northern latitudes was observed in 2013, with just 1.66 of the roughly 138,000 available acres visited by the monarchs arriving from the Northern U.S. and Southern Canada typically located east of the Rockies in a journey that begins in August each year and ends in late October.

MONARCHS

While many factors play into the decreasing number of overwintering monarchs in Mexico, which in turn serve as an indicator of the overall population of the insect, one of the biggest is the disappearance of milkweed stands which once were abundant on the prairies, plains and other areas of North America which fostered the recruitment of the continent's most notable butterfly species. There are 73 types of milkweed found in North America, of which 30 or so are utilized by monarch caterpillars in their early stages of life for growth and development before they form their cocoons and turn into adults. But with the development of land and the widespread usage of herbicides such as glyphosate which have immediate and often-wide spreading effects on areas not part of crop fields, including nearby milkweed stands, these areas which served as the butterflies' rearing grounds have decreased in recent years.

Through the efforts of conservation groups, gardening clubs, and even fans of backyard butterflies, however, the tide of missing milkweed plants may be turning to the benefit of monarchs and other pollinators who rely on the flowers for food. Whether part of a program for planting conservation areas, or simply a packet of the puffball-driven seeds handed out to gardeners and flower-tenders, efforts to reestablish milkweed on the landscape in rural, suburban and urban areas are growing and with them, hope for monarch butterfly populations rebounding in the near future.

While the expectation is to increase the options available to these insects, which make one of nature's most incredible and arduous journeys to continue their populations, more work must be done to ensure the expansion of rearing places for their young when they return to the upper Midwest and surrounding areas each spring and summer to continue the cycle. Through the efforts of local conservation groups creating seed packets and national organization like the Xerces Society (xerces.org) assisting in the creation of places for pollinators of all kinds, monarchs and many other species vital to the production of food, flowers and a vibrant ecological web will continue to rebound. With the addition of milkweed to any planting, monarchs will have a place to start their annual cycle in the upper Midwest and in all regions they inhabit.

The iconic monarch butterfly is solely dependent on milkweed as its food source during the caterpillar stage of its life.
