DAKOTA GARDENER

By Joe Zeleznik, Forester
NDSU Extension

I sometimes wonder if I would have made a good historian.

I enjoy reading about the past, and I've done quite a bit of research through archival documents to learn about our ancestors.

What will the history books say about 2021 and what happened to the trees? I hope they'll say that it was an average year and nothing special happened.

On the opposite end of the spectrum, I would make a terrible financial planner. Predict what's going to happen to the market in the next three years? I can barely predict what's going to happen in the next three days.

Yet for the trees of North Dakota, I'm thinking about the next three to six months. It's early March and most of North Dakota is in a drought; in more than two-thirds of the state, that's a severe drought.

How will that affect the trees? About the best we can do is make an educated guess because a lot depends on the weather this spring and summer.

If it stays dry, the trees will be highly stressed. Trees that already were stressed from insect and disease pressure likely will decline and some will die. Those that remain will be more susceptible to pests. It's a vicious cycle: stress upon stress upon stress.

But we certainly have hope. For now, subsoil moisture is still OK. And trees have survived droughts in North Dakota in the past. The Dust Bowl years of the 1930s were some of the worst in the last 300 years, but droughts in the 1840s and 1860s were terrible as well. A lot of trees survived.

If the drought worsens in 2021, one species that's likely to respond quickly is hackberry. Hackberry is one of the first species to drop its leaves when the soil dries up. The trees then go dormant. It's actually a great survival mechanism.

Other species will hold onto their leaves a bit longer; they might shut down their actual growth without going dormant but will hold onto their leaves. If moisture conditions improve later in the summer, those other species will have an advantage because they still have their leaves. In that situation, hackberry would be less competitive. It's a trade-off in survival mechanisms.

Another concern right now is the lack of snow cover in central and western North Dakota. Snow provides a lot of insulation to the soil, but without it, soil temperatures can drop far lower than they normally do. That will stress tree roots and sometimes will kill them.

I'm usually pretty tough on my own trees. To survive in my yard, they're going to have to make it on their own. I rarely water them. In 2021, I might have to rethink that attitude. Maybe it's time to think about irrigation or controlling weeds and grass competition a bit more.

If you decide to irrigate your own trees, remember to go low and slow. Let the water slowly sink into the soil. And make sure to move the hose or sprinkler around the tree for better coverage. Tree roots extend far beyond the dripline of the tree crown.

Try to avoid saline water, if you can. That would make the stress even worse.

So what will the history books say about the trees in 2021? Most of them survived. Even though times were tough, the trees were tougher.

Your First Garden

By Leah Maertens

Start small!! You may decide you don't enjoy attempting to outwit deer, raccoons, rabbits, squirrels and various insects and worms that are determined to share your produce with you. Your garden should be in the full sun. Now, stake it out. Next get a soil sample. Either get the information sheet from the Extension office or call for how to get it on the internet. The number is 218-998-8760. Take a sample from each end of your plot. If it comes back telling you that the soil is either heavy clay or mostly sand, build a raised bed. It will take you years for these soils to make good gardens. If the soil is good, remove all the grass before you even think of digging or tilling. Till it in and you will be fighting grass and weeds for years. If you need to make a raised bed, start by putting 2 to Layers of cardboard in the bottom. This will keep weeds from popping up later.

Fill with potting soil, bagged compost and good garden soil. All garden soil will pack down. You need the bed to drain well.

Buy tomato, pepper, celery and cabbage family plants. Read the labels. They should tell you how far apart to plant it, how big it will get and when it will ripen. Tomatoes and cabbages like elbow room. Peppers like to cuddle. Bigger plants are not better. The smaller ones will have less transplant shock. Vines should have no more than 4 true leaves. You can directly seed the leafy greens, radish, peas, corn, beans and the vines. Unless you have a lot of room, plant bush type vines. They are a bit more behaved than the regular ones. Tomatoes come in determinate and indeterminate types. The indeterminate will grow vines and produce tomatoes all summer. The determinate will grow until it produces its fruit then stop.

Your garden will need at least one inch of water a week.

If you don't think you will enjoy pulling weeds Lay 4 to 6 layers of damp newspaper between the rows and cover with leaves, straw, hay or grass clippings if they don't have chemicals on them.

Take a walk through your garden at least every other day. This will help you keep ahead of any problems and get the vegetables before either the critters have them for lunch or when they are ripe.

These directions work for flower gardens too. Planting plants will get fast results. You can direct sow zinnias, marigolds and cleome for blooms later in the season.

You are bound to have a few failures, all gardeners do. Don't get discouraged, remember it's a learning experience just like you tell your kids. And, of course, you can always call the Extension office. They can put you in touch with a Master Gardener. Bev Johnson M.G.

OUR OUTDOORS

The Pulls of Two New Seasons

BY NICK SIMONSON
DAKOTA EDGE OUTDOORS

I questioned the wind and the chill blowing in the mist rising off the wavy surface of the small powerplant lake, a place I frequent this time of year to cure cabin fever prepare things for openwater and chase the largemouth bass and crappies that are two months ahead of their brothers and sisters in the ice-covered lakes around them. I knew that the wind was wrong for any effective fishing, coming straight from the far shore and lifting a fog off the water toward the launch, but I was also aware that this might be the only time to get a feel on how the boat was doing and more importantly, the old

Mercury 25 on its stern. I solo launched rather awkwardly, brought the boat to the shoreline, now well exposed from a dry fall and winter, and parked the truck before returning and setting sail against the wind under the full power of the reliable trolling motor on the bow.

Once in position along the steep rockline where my panfishing adventures often begin, I anchored up and threw a few dozen casts before I mentally prepared for a shoulder workout. In every season, the old Merc has turned over, albeit with a little bit of bulb pumping, choke tweaking and sometimes a good session or two of rope pulling. I can recall waking up the next day after some initial adventures and feeling as if I had done a couple of workouts where I had solely focused on just my right arm. Bracing for the day's second workout, I pumped the blend of gas, two-cycle oil and a shot of Seafoam which was well mixed from the drive up to the lake and felt the fuel line pressurize. I grabbed the handle of the line and gave the first solid jerk of the season. Brrrrrrmmmmrrrrrr!!

I'm sure my eyes grew to the size of whatever uncooperative monster panfish were below and not biting in the after-effects of the overnight cold front. On the first pull, the motor spit and then streamed the warm lake water out and a white haze of whatever was left in the carburetor after last season and the exhaust of the gasoline mixture disappeared into the fog rolling toward shore. It achieved a steady hum and the exhaust cleared as I let it idle for a few minutes before I flipped the handle shifter into forward and did donuts on the choppy lake surface to break it in for the season. As I did, the sun came out and the mist gave way to the warming temperatures of the day and the chilly red in my fingertips subsided to a normal peach. Regardless of the slow bite, it was a great start to the openwater season, and took far less pulls than the rest of the weekend's break-in efforts.

Under the Gun
The shoulder workout I was expecting with the boat came at the trap range on Sunday, as I was blown by the northwest winds from the parking lot to the trap house. Feeling all sorts of rusty, due to limited shooting last summer, I loaded the pocket of my green mesh vest with a box of target loads and took the open spot in a group of five behind the house. On my first call of "Pull!" I smashed the right-angling target and felt confident that I knew where my gun was sitting, but unlike the motor, my aim quickly sputtered and I was all over the place.

It'd be five more targets before I'd connect again, and I'd replay each shot and what I did wrong - behind, jerked, under - trying to find consistency. At the end of my first round, a disappointing single digit total was all I had to show for my efforts. But, like the old Mercury, I was determined to stick with it and I ripped the top of another box of shells off and flipped it with the wind into the garbage barrel.

The group I had joined had departed, and though they were shooting before I had arrived, I'm somewhat suspicious that they may have been embarrassed to be in my company. Alone, I went through the five stands, calling for clays from the remote speakers and following them out over the horizon.

Suddenly, like the fuel flowing through the engine of the outboard, things began to grab and refill the spaces in my mind. Hold points on the house, follow-through at the time of the trigger pull and after, and the timing between calling for the bird and firing, all began to fall into place, and the number of targets taken climbed up into the teens. With the mental and physical cylinders beginning to click in rhythm, I opted for one more round and things began to hum.

Set-pull!-rise-bang!-dust. Set-pull!-rise-bang!-dust. Set-pull!-rise-bang!-dust.

The pattern went unbroken for 11 targets and I finished the final post a perfect five-for-five to end with a 21 and felt confident that would provide a good base for the weeks to come. My arms and shoulder felt the stress of a different workout from holding and swinging the weight of the heavy trap gun, and the slight soreness in my right cheek was a reminder of a new shooting sports season's start. While the mechanics of it all didn't quite come together as quickly as that of the motor the morning before, it did eventually. And that's all one can ask for as another pair of seasons get started...in our outdoors.
