Trees are Tough

DAKOTA GARDENER

By Joe Zelezní
Forester
NDSU Extension

I'm a terrible gardener. How terrible? One year, I couldn't even grow a zucchini. It's true.

This year, our peppers and tomatoes – in pots on the deck – are looking awful. I finally realized that the problem was a lack of nutrients, not overwatering. After adding some fertilizer last week, they do finally look like they're pulling out of it.

That's one of the reasons I love trees so much. They're so forgiving. I've planted them too early, too late, too shallowly and occasionally too deeply. And yet they usually survive, and even thrive. Long-lived perennials have to be tough like that, adapting to an ever-changing environment, even though they're stuck in place.

Right now, trees are cranking away with photosynthesis, using the chlorophyll in their leaves and energy from the sun to combine carbon dioxide and water and make sugar. That sugar then moves around the tree to produce wood, bark, new twigs and leaves, roots, flowers and fruit.

It's an amazing process. The amount of sugar that's produced is huge, and then it moves around a biological system that can be 80, 90 or even 100 feet in the air. And there's a widespread below-ground system that's just as big that we rarely see.

Trees are so tough that they don't even need all of their leaves. Let me explain.

Trees get partially defoliated every year. Some insects feed on leaf tissue and some fungi will cause leaves to drop prematurely. Even a bad wind storm can result in some leaf loss. However, if that loss is less than about 25%, then the tree doesn't even feel it.

This was brought home to me when I read a scientific article where the authors had punched holes in leaves, as if the leaves were being eaten by insects, and then they measured the effects on photosynthesis. For low levels of leaf loss, less than about 30%, overall photosynthesis wasn't affected at all. The remaining leaf tissue easily made up for the lost tissue. Only above that 30% threshold did the trees start to be stressed. Amazing!

That fits right in with our pruning guidelines: Take out no more than about 25% of the branches or leaves in any one year. The old guidelines used 33% as the cutoff. Yes, the numbers are slightly different, but they're still in the ballpark. If a tree has lost less than 25% of its leaf tissue, don't worry about it. It'll be OK.

Not only are the leaves feeding their trees, they're also indirectly feeding their ecosystems. Years ago, I was working on a project to collect seeds from ash trees to help us prepare for emerald ash borer. One specific black ash tree in Minnesota was absolutely covered with seeds. I collected almost 23,000 seeds from that single tree, and it looked like I had barely touched it.

What would happen to all those remaining seeds? Certainly not all of them would survive to germinate and produce new black ash trees. And that's when I began to understand that this tree – indeed, all plants – are feeding the ecosystem. They're feeding the bacteria, fungi, worms, insects and other small critters. Those animals become food for field mice, voles, birds and other small animals. Those in turn feed the larger animals. But it all starts with the trees and other plants.

As I said at the beginning, I'm a terrible gardener. The tomatoes and peppers need some TLC. But trees have to be tough. Basically, I put them in the ground and then walk away. And they usually do just fine.

Lake Sakakawea Report

DAKOTA EDGE

BY MIKE PELUSO,
 DAKOTA EDGE OUTDOORS

Well, I'm pretty sure I completely jinxed myself with my last report talking about my boat puller "Old Blue." Unfortunately, Old Blue is no longer with us today and I'm looking for a replacement.

Thank goodness for my dad letting me borrow his vehicle until I can figure something out. What I really want to get is a full size AWD or 4WD van, which is not an easy find. I think for as much as I fish both summer and winter this would be a match made in heaven, so if anyone knows of one for sale, please let me know!

Now to the real important stuff: the fishing! I'll start with Lake Sakakawea this time. Sakakawea is really starting to fire on all cylinders right now and lots of fish are being caught. You can still find the fish relatively shallow. The windier the day, the shallower the fish. About 5 to 15 feet of water seems to be holding the bulk of the biting fish. I am seeing lots laying out deep, but those fish are either traveling or digesting their food because they are hard to catch.

One noteworthy shift this week is that the fish have switched over to crawlers. We are able to run half crawlers on slow death or live bait rigs with small hooks to catch our fish. This is very client-friendly and helps put numbers of fish in the boat. There are a couple things to pay attention to, however. The first is water temperature and the second is the current. This will assist you in tracking the fish down and once you find them, to fish them correctly.

I'm seeing lots of anglers not pulling their baits correctly. With the current you will have to adjust your speed if you're going against it. Pay close attention to this factor.

Next on the list this week is Devils Lake. Again, this place just simply amazes me. The quality and quantity of the fish is impressive this year. Spinners and crawlers on structure are taking the bulk of the fish, but don't forget to cast on those windy days into the wind-blown shorelines. The lake is reverting back to its old self.

On a side note, I'm still seeing a lot of folks launching their boats multiple times. Especially around the campground areas. Please, if you see these folks cleaning fish multiple times a day, report them to the Game and Fish! I feel our daily limit is more than fair, and there is no need to be double dipping. It's not an endless resource. Limits are in place for a reason.

The fishing on these two bodies of water is absolutely world class right now! I have a few dates in August and September available if you are looking to get out. Also, it's definitely not too early to be booking your ice fishing adventure on Devils Lake with me! Those spots tend to fill up fast, so don't drag your feet.

For the second year, parents will be able to purchase curated school supply packages customized to each classroom of local schools.

Ndschoolsupplies.com, which launched in 2020, is set to officially reopen its school supply store on Thursday, with custom supply packages ready for purchase. The website, coordinated by BHG Inc., offers parents packages of school supplies based on the individual supply lists of over a dozen area schools.

Parents will be able to select a package based on their child's specific school and grade level, knowing the contents are exactly what the student needs to start the 2020-21 school year. Each package includes all required writing materials, organizational supplies, and more, and will be shipped to the parent before school starts in the fall.

Some common household items, like headphones, backpacks and paint T-shirts, are not included in packages but are available as individual purchase options on the site. Any item that is required but not included is listed in the description of each package.

"It was important for us to offer a convenient option for parents to get the supplies they needed, offer an easy way to give back to our schools and encourage local spending," BHG management said of the project.

Area schools contributed their supply lists for collaboration on the website in order to ensure packages would be accurate for the fall start to school. Schools also included "wish list" items that can be donated to the school in a separate category of the site labeled "Donate".

Shirts for each school are also available for purchase on the website.

All orders placed on the website by July 30 have a guaranteed delivery date of Aug. 11. Orders can be shipped to the buyer's home or picked up at the Garrison or Washburn BHG location free of charge.

School supply packages are set to cover classrooms in nearly 20 local schools, though some supply lists have not been made available yet. Supply packages will be added as lists are confirmed with local schools.
