DAKOTA DATEBOOK

Suffrage Bill

North Dakota has a very contradictory history when it comes to women. As the 19th century blended into the 20th, many thousands of women moved here to homestead and wrestle out a living for themselves. Despite their hardiness and proven strength, their road to getting the vote was a rocky one. It was on this day in 1917 that they finally achieved their goal.

Women's Suffrage almost passed as early as 1872—in Dakota Territory—failing by only one vote. In 1885, Republican Territorial Governor, Gilbert Pierce, vetoed the measure, reasoning that if they allowed women to vote, it might ruin the territory's chances at statehood.

Four years later, the new state of North Dakota did give women the right to vote on school issues, and in 1892, Independents backed Laura Eisenhuth for Superintendent of Education. Although women were still being held back, they have also a tendency to make history; Eisenhuth won, making her the first woman in the country to hold statewide elective office.

In 1913, the Women's Suffrage Act was again passed by the legislature, but this time it was turned down by the state's all-male voters. Women's suffrage was closely linked to restricting the use of alcohol, the Christian Temperance Union wanted also to limit child labor, restrict the sale of obscene literature, and separate first offenders from long-term convicts in prisons. Those who were opposed to these notions, especially those who favored the liquor trade, strongly opposed them. Others who were opposed to women's suffrage included the McKenzie political machine, the railroads, and foreign-born men, particularly the Germans.

Things turned around for pro-active women when the Non-Partisan League gained control. The NPL put women's suffrage on their platform, and in 1917, the legislature gave women the right to vote in local and presidential elections. Then two years later, they ratified the federal Woman Suffrage amendment, and women were given the right to vote for statewide offices as well.

For the first time, women used their full voting rights on November 2nd, 1920.

Later, North Dakota women made further headlines: just three years after they'd won the vote, two women won seats in the ND State Legislature. One of these, Minnie Craig, ended up serving as a Representative for six consecutive sessions, and in 1933, she made history when she was elected Speaker of the House. It was the first time in national history that a woman served as the head of a legislative body.

The next step in women's rights began in 1923, with the Equal Rights Amendment. When it finally came up for ratification in North Dakota in 1973, it passed in the Senate but lost by one vote in the House. The following year, it came up for a vote again and passed, making North Dakota the 34th out of 38 states to ratify the ERA. Ultimately, that amendment failed.

DAKOTA GARDENER

Gabbing with the greenery

BY CARRIE KNUTSON,
*Horticulture Agent
NDSU Extension*

Do you talk to your plants? I read an interesting article last year on this topic and filed it away for later use. It turns out the dark foggy days of January are the perfect time to explore the benefits of plants in our lives.

In 2022, Trees.com surveyed 1,250 people to see how chatty they are with their plants.

Forty-eight percent of the people surveyed reported talking to their trees and/or plants. One in five of those people talk to their plants every day. Houseplants were the most talked to at 80%, outdoor plants at 62% and trees at 37%. Most importantly, 62% said talking with plants helps with their mental health.

On the reverse side, 34% of the people surveyed have never talked to their plants and 18% don't have any plants to talk to. They are missing out if you ask me. If you have never talked to a plant, even it is just to yell at a pigweed that missed a weeding, are you really living your fullest life?

The above survey results may be slightly or very humorous to you depending on how you would respond to the questions. However, there is no denying the benefits we get from including plants in our lives.

According to the National Initiative for Consumer Horticulture (NICH), indoor plants at home stimulate both a physiological and psychological relaxation response. At work, they boost creativity and productivity and increase job satisfaction. Don't forget that indoor plants link us to nature, especially important during our long winters.

So, how many plants do you have in your home or at your office? I will admit my office is a bit of a jungle at 21 plants! They earn their keep by helping me write my article for this column!

The NICH lists the many benefits of outdoor plants too. As little as five minutes of "green" exercise (including gardening), improves both our self-esteem and mood. Gardening is good exercise. Moderate intensity garden activity counts towards our Centers for Disease Control's recommended weekly 150 minutes of moderate exercise. Most importantly, gardeners tend to eat healthier food.

So, what are you waiting for? Grab your seed catalogues and start talking with your indoor greenery while you make your outdoor greenery plans. Happy gardening!

PRAIRIE DOC® PERSPECTIVES

BY KELLY EVANS-HULLINGER, MD

Not all that forgets is dementia

Frequently, my patients will come to a visit and bring up a major concern: “Doc, I think I might have dementia; my memory seems to be slipping.” They might give examples of having difficulty finding words, forgetting people’s names, or just feeling like their thinking is slower. Many of them know a family member who had dementia, and they are worried.

My first response is to hear their concerns; of course, if a patient is showing early signs of dementia, we want to assess that and do our best to get to a diagnosis for them. What I have found, however, is that often when these concerns are raised, we find things that are not dementia to explain them.

As we age, some symptoms perceived as memory changes are probably within the spectrum of normal. The occasional forgetting or having a delay finding words is a great example of this. More difficulty recalling names is another. This can be normal at any age but tends to happen more frequently as our brains age.

Sometimes patients are noticing real and concerning issues, but through medical evaluation, we find non-dementia reasons for them. The most common reason would be – you guessed it – medications. While many medications can affect cognition especially in older patients, often we can blame drugs with anti-cholinergic properties (even over-the-counter diphenhydramine found in cold, allergy, and sleep medication) and benzodiazepines (usually prescribed for anxiety or sleep). Patients should review their medications, both prescription and over-the-counter, as an early step in evaluating these concerns.

Other common mimics of cognitive change in older patients are depression, anxiety, and sleep disorders. These disorders can cause the brain to be unfocused and distracted which frequently manifests as forgetfulness. Treating the underlying condition effectively will usually improve one’s cognition, so we should look for signs of those when evaluating memory concerns.

Numerous other medical causes can also impair one’s cognition and memory. These include vitamin deficiencies, abnormal electrolytes, infections, or abnormalities in the brain like bleeding, tumors, or hydrocephalus. Further, there are numerous causes of dementia; Alzheimer’s disease being just one. A thorough history, exam, and sometimes labs or imaging might be warranted if true cognitive impairment is present.

To be clear, if you are experiencing symptoms of change in memory, don’t assume it is dementia. Talk with your medical provider; it may be normal or have any of a long list of other causes. Let’s figure it out together.

Helping Words

By Rev. Erin Lynn Gullickson
Dakota Prairie Winds Parish

Seeking healing or peace

Where do you go when seeking healing or peace? How do you find encouragement or hope? Who is a constant source of reliability in your life? These are the questions that roll round my mind as it becomes more and more obvious how we’ve neglected tending to life giving practices. Believe it or not, one of the life-giving things we often ignore is the simple act of breathing. The next time you’re angry, frustrated, threatened, or stressed – are you still breathing? Chances are good you’re holding your breath. Our bodies are wired to temporarily inhibit a subconscious brain activity, like breathing, to allow the brain to divert its resources when carrying out a difficult task.

During a recent session filled with ranted frustrations, I led the group through a simple breathing exercise. I asked them to set ‘down anything they might be holding in their hands, invited them to close their eyes, to settle into their chair comfortably, and then instructed them to take a long, deep, breath. The breath for a few seconds and then slowly breathed out. After doing this twice, they opened their eyes looking to me; I said, “You are now two breaths closer to death.”

That got quite a reaction! The group knows me well and were clearly expecting some other words or loving affirmation. After dodging then pens and other odd projectiles thrown my way, I gently reminded them of the truth, they would not get those two breaths back. Morbid as it sounds, you too, will not regain the breaths you took while reading this column. However, you do get to choose how you’ll continue using the gift of breath in this lifetime. Scripturally, the breath of God gives us life, delivers the Holy Spirit, and breathes through the Word of God, always.

You’re free to choose how you live using the holy gift of breath. Some choose to spout nonsensical garbage, create unrealistic demands, or publicly demean and shame the acts of others, in essence, wasting breath and suffocating life. I’d encourage you to remember though we cannot choose all circumstances in life, we can choose to use our breath as the holy gift it is... may this life you’re given be filled with deep breaths of reverence, wonder, gratitude, and love for the Creator of all, and the True Life offered us in the foolishness of the cross.

The Spirit of God has made me; the breath of the Almighty gives me life. – Job 33:4
