Memorial Day

The high school band played in the background.

The doors of the Memorial Hall were wide open as if to bid welcome to each person who arrived.

The women in red jackets at the table inside the door smiled as she greeted each one.

Red poppies made their way from her bouquet into eager hands.

On the overhead screen were the words, "Victor B. Wallin Post 141st Memorial Day Service". It's probably been ten years since I attended a gathering of the community to honor those who served their country so valiantly in her various wars and conflicts. And it was time for me to do so. Time for me to stop and take stock of what was taking place before my very eyes as the band played, the elementary school children's school choir sang, the speaker spoke and the rollcall of Veterans who had died was read.

I remembered.

I remembered playing in the band and the circumstances surrounding the names I heard and the faces which had aged considerably, and I realized something. Time had not stood still but had performed a work in this hometown community I had returned to so recently. Tradition happened and timeless truths had taken hold; thus, the values and foundational principles I now espoused were firmly set in place.

Classmates and old friends were now the community leaders, and their idea of change didn't quite measure up to mine. When the realization dawned that this is the way these folks like it; they don't like change just for change's sake.

Change has to include "better, necessary or practical' and few people have an existential view of life from out here on the North Dakota prairies. This is where freedom rings—in the context of life in a small town. And here I am trying to make sense of what the future holds for me.

In two weeks, I'll go to the polls and cast my vote for national, state, and local figures on the political landscape.

How will I vote? Does it matter?

In the grand scheme of things, will my vote make any real difference?

The answer to these questions is an unequivocal yes because I learned what things are important in life growing up in a family who lived and participated in activities like the Memorial Day services and parades to commemorate the sacrifice of men and women who served so faithfully in the armed forces. This happened as I observed and listened to the lives of many parents. And I didn't even realize what was being formed in my heart that would affect the direction of my life.

Since I've been back in Washburn, things have become simpler and more straightforward and how I move ahead to vote and speak out for what I believe will reflect a re-entry to what I call my "formation" years. Hearing those elementary age children sing, "I'm proud to be an American" made me proud to be standing with them as a witness to their future!

THANKS

I wish to express a heartfelt thank you to all of my family and friends for all the love and concern shown to me after my recent surgery. Thank you for all the visits, flowers, cards, meals, all the visits, ect. That I have received. Thank you for all of your thoughts and prayers.

Love Carol Lelm

PRAIRIE FARE

By By Amanda Kriens, CCHW

What should we eat and do as we age?

"I have an old man body now," the person in the restaurant said. "I keep gaining weight."

He wasn't talking to me or my husband. His booming voice carried across the nearly empty restaurant. We heard the saga of

I wasn't trying to eavesdrop. Really, I wasn't. I just couldn't tune out his voice.

The man talked about how easy it was to lose weight in high school. Sometimes he needed to cut weight while in wrestling, and he dropped several pounds easily.

He gained weight in college then easily lost it. He talked about the difficulty of losing weight at his present age. I am guessing he was somewhere in his 50s.

We weren't eating in a health food restaurant, I will admit.

I looked across the restaurant to see what he was eating. I could see that he wasn't eating a salad.

I estimated he had a full day's allotment of calories heaped on his plate. I didn't fly across the restaurant in my dietitian cape or suggest he have a complete physical with his healthcare provider. I would never do that, but he did inspire this column.

My husband and I both requested to-go boxes after listening to his story.

Unfortunately, we cannot stay eating the same number of calories throughout life and expect to stay the same weight. Changes in weight status with age are quite predictable as we grow older, unless we take some action in our nutrition and fitness.

As we grow older, we need to be aware of our physical activity and nutrition, even more so than in our youth. For most people, metabolism slows down and we need fewer calories and a nutrientrich diet.

We need to get our heart beating with aerobic activity, such as walking around the neighborhood or playing a fun game such as pickleball.

Adults of all ages need about 150 minutes of moderate-intensity physical activity.

We also tend to lose muscle as we grow older, unless we take some steps to maintain our strength. Muscle-strengthening activities become even more important. Take a class with strength-maintaining exercises.

When your muscles are strong, you can get out of a chair easily, carry in groceries and twist the lids off of containers.

Doing activities such as yoga or standing on one leg helps maintain our balance. This is especially important in reducing our risk

Nutrition is vitally important in maintaining our health throughout life, but especially as we grow

While packaged snack foods may be tempting, some snacks are healthier than others. Making our calories "count" remains important throughout life.

Consider these tips.

Choose foods with little or no added sugars. Compare nutrition labels. Regular soda is high in added sugars with at least 12 teaspoons of sweetener per 12-ounce can. Reserve those bottled calories for occasional Stay hydrated by drinking plenty of water, even when you may not feel thirsty. Our thirst mechanism may not work as well as we age. Drinking low-fat or fat-free milk and 100% fruit or vegetable juice can help with hydration, too. However, choose whole fruits and vegetables more often than juice.

Choose foods with less sodium and saturated fat to help maintain a heart-healthy diet. Compare the values on the label.

Get enough protein to maintain muscle mass. Choose a variety of protein-rich foods from plant and animal sources. Protein-rich foods can help maintain our muscles, along with weightbearing activities.

Focus on these nutrients of concern: potassium, calcium, vitamin D and dietary fiber. Fruits, vegetables and dairy products are excellent sources of potassium, for example. If you follow a strict vegetarian or vegan diet, you probably need a dietary supplement of vitamin B-12. Work with your healthcare provider to determine your needs.

Visit the gov website for a free downloadable list of your calorie and nutrition needs. Visit with a registered dietitian for a good assessment of your current diet.

Instead of a recipe, here are some snack ideas that also provide nutrition in every bite. Try to include two or three of the five food groups (grains, vegetable, fruit, dairy and protein) when you choose a snack:

Hummus (chickpea dip) and whole-wheat pita bread.

Vegetables, such as carrots or broccoli spears, with low-fat or fatfree ranch dip.

Mozzarella cheese sticks with whole-grain crackers.

Baked tortilla chips with black bean and corn salsa.

Dried fruit, such as dried cranberries, and lightly salted nuts, such as almonds.

Low-fat vogurt with sliced fresh

Popcorn and apple slices.

For a variety of recipes, see www.ag.ndsu.edu/food and click on "recipes."

See www.ag.ndsu.edu/nourish to learn about our "Nourish" program that is offered both online and face-to-face.

Fort Stevenson breaks world record

They did it.

Fort Stevenson State Park officially set the new GUINNESS WORLD RECORDSTM title for the "Most People Making S'mores Simultaneously.'

The previous record was set in Texas with a mere 891 people.

On Saturday afternoon 1,150 people ascended to Fort Stevenson. They entered the event site in a single file line to all be officially accounted for as part of the park's 50th Anniversary year.

We are ecstatic to have achieved this record, knowing it couldn't have happened with- out the amazing people of North Dakota," Fort Stevenson State Park Manager Chad Trautman said. "Our 50th anniversary is a significant milestone, and this record attempt was the perfect way to celebrate. All the volunteers and visitors that came together to make history today helped us create an unforgettable event."

- McLean County Independent Central McLean JV Baseball triumphs in Beulah Tournament

Last week, the Central McLean JV baseball team capped off their season in spectacular style by clinching the title at the end-of-year JV Baseball Tournament in Beulah.

Demonstrating skill, determination, and a team spirit that bodes well for their future, the young squad emerged undefeated with a flawless 3-0 record.

The tournament journey began with a commanding 7-2 victory over St. Mary's, where Central McLean's pitching and strategic batting set the tone for their tournament run.

Washburn area residents honored by opportunity to participate in Honor Flight

Two Washburn area residents had an opportunity of a lifetime recently, as both received the call to participate in a journey with the Western North Dakota Honor Flight. Both Lowell Rader and Mike Kidd traveled to Washington D.C. via the Western ND Honor Flight pro-gram, to tour the city and visit the nation's war memorials that

The Western North Dakota Honor Flight is, according to the non-profit organization's website, "created solely to honor America's veterans for all their sacrifices. We transport our heroes to Washington, D.C. to visit and reflect at their memorials.'

- Leader-News Center's Memorial Day to be held at CSHS May 27

A Memorial Day observance service will be held at the Center-Stanton High School Monday morning, May 27.

The event will include guest speaker retired U.S. Army Chief Warrant Officer Kyle Skager and three students from Center-Stanton Elementary School, who will read essays they wrote on freedom.

This year we added something a little new," said Brian Helmenstein of Center's American Legion Post 90. "Our auxiliary group did a program for fifth and sixth graders where the children were asked to write down what freedom meant to them," Helmenstein said. "From there, I guess they picked three top winners and they will be part of the service."

Elementary students are Kairi Johnson, Kinley Boeshans and Coy Hopfauf.

- Center Republican Graduates urged to face their Goliaths

Sometimes problems and challenges can look like giants and monsters to people, seemingly too mighty and strong to possibly overcome.

But, drawing on the story of David and Goliath, a pas- tor in Hazen urged the graduating seniors of the Class of 2024 to find the faith and courage to face the Goliaths in their lives.

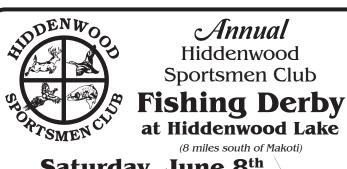

Pastor Randy Emgarten from English Lutheran Church was the keynote speaker at the Hazen Baccalaureate Service on May 15. The service was held at the Hazen High School Theater, with the soon-to-be graduates and their families attending.

– Hazen Star Two candidates running for Beulah BOE seat for 3-year term

Two candidates are vying for a 3-year-term seat on Beulah Public Schools' Board of Education for the June 11 primary election. THE VITAL ROLE OF BROOD REARING HABITAT FOR PHEASANTS

Pheasants and other upland game birds like grouse and partridge require a variety of habitats to thrive throughout the year. Among these, broodrearing habitat is especially critical for their survival and population sustainability. Understanding the specific needs of pheasants during this period is essential for effective conservation efforts.

Importance of Brood Rearing Habitat

Brood-rearing habitat becomes crucial immediately after chicks hatch, typically from late spring through summer. During this vulnerable period, pheasant chicks face high mortality rates due to predation and exposure to harsh environmental conditions. Therefore, providing optimal brood-rearing habitat is vital to their survival. Good brood-rearing habitat contains the following

1. Vegetative Cover: Adequate overhead and lateral cover are essential to protect chicks from predators and extreme weather. Vegetation like tall wheat stubble, alfalfa regrowth, and cover crops offer the necessary structure to shield chicks while providing easy access to food sources. This type of cover not only offers protection but also helps in temperature regulation, which is critical for chicks that have not yet developed the ability to thermoregulate.

2. Insect Abundance: Nutrition is a key factor for the growth of young pheasants, and they rely heavily on insects during their early days. Diverse plant communities that support a rich insect population are ideal. Areas with a mix of wildflowers, legumes, and bunch-grasses typically offer the best conditions for foraging chicks, ensuring they have access to a high-protein diet that is essential for their development.

3. Bare Ground: For ease of movement and foraging, pheasant chicks need areas of bare ground interspersed with vegetation. Effective land management practices, such as disking or controlled burns, promote earlysuccessional plants and help maintain the necessary balance of bare ground and vegetative cover.

Comparing Brood Rearing to Other Seasonal Habitats While brood-rearing habitat is indispensable during the first stages of life, other seasonal habitats also play significant roles throughout the year:

1. Nesting Habitat: In the spring, secure nesting cover is essential for egg laying and incubation. This habitat must provide dense, undisturbed vegetation to protect nests from predators and adverse weather conditions. Unlike broodrearing habitat, nesting sites are chosen primarily for their security and cover rather than proximity to food sources.

2. Winter Habitat: During the winter months, pheasants require habitats that offer protection from cold weather and access to high-energy food sources. Dense grasses, shelterbelts, and strategically placed food plots are critical during this period. These habitats must provide both cover and food in close proximity to minimize energy expenditure and reduce exposure to predators.

3. Food Plots: Throughout the year, but especially in winter, food plots are essential for providing the necessary nutrition. These plots should be strategically placed near cover to reduce the need for pheasants to venture into open, exposed areas. Corn and grain sorghum are generally the most reliable food sources, offering the needed sustenance during harsh winter conditions.

Integrated Habitat Management

Effective conservation for pheasants involves integrating these habitat types to ensure year-round support. Key strategies include the following focal points.

1. Ensuring Continuity: Maintaining connected habitats that cater to the different life stages of pheasants—from nesting through brood-rearing to winter survival—is essential for their overall well-being.

2. Promoting Diversity: Encouraging a mix of plant species supports a robust ecosystem that meets the diverse needs of pheasants throughout the year. This diversity not only benefits pheasants but also other wildlife that share their habitat.

3. Adaptive Practices: Utilizing adaptive land management practices such as rotational grazing, controlled burns, and selective planting helps create and sustain high-quality habitats. These practices ensure that the habitat remains suitable for pheasants and other wildlife over time.

While each type of habitat plays a crucial role in the life cycle of pheasants, brood-rearing habitat is particularly important for ensuring the survival of young pheasants. By focusing on creating and maintaining these habitats, conservation efforts can significantly improve the sustainability and resilience of pheasant populations.

Fish Benefit from Dam removal

As lowhead dams fall on and around the Red River, hundreds of miles of habitat is becoming reconnected for the benefit of fish in the main stem of the flow and its tributaries. While lake sturgeon restoration projects beginning in the 1990s have been the impetus for some of these lowhead dam removals and replacements with stair-step rock rapids, the benefits go beyond the reintroduction of just the ancient fish to the Red River and across all species, according to Nick Kludt, Red River Fisheries Specialist for the Minnesota DNR (MN DNR).

We were excited to see how are the sturgeon, the walleye, and just all of our native species going to respond to that. So, in 2024 through some joint monitoring conducted by some of our offices we kept an eye on those sites, and it was super rewarding to see those fish move from what were some substandard habitat into that newly-restored habitat, spawn there, and use that for a good portion of the spring. So that was just a huge management win for us," Kludt explains.

Perhaps the largest impediment to fish movements on the Red River was the last standing lowhead dam on the main Drayton, N.D. While a popular destination for anglers seeking large catfish which could go no further upstream and were located in the areas below the structure, the aging dam served as a choke point which cut the north-flowing river in two, limiting the travels of fish upstream into the numerous tributaries located on both the Minnesota and North Dakota sides of the water and its origin near Wahpeton, N.D.

"As far as river mileage [now open to fish movement] goes, you can now basically count the entire Red River basin, within reason, because we just got done modifying Drayton Dam within the last year. So, everything upstream would count for mileage, and then of course all the projects that we've deployed in the tributaries. An exact number is really difficult to calculate just based on the differing ways you might go about doing that," Kludt states.

In 2022 partner groups including the MN DNR, North Dakota Game & Fish Department (NDG&F), U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, began the process of replacing the Drayton Dam with a stair-step rapids which would allow fish movement and replace the aging structure which was becoming an infrastructure liability and continued to be a public safety concern. The new structure was in place in late 2023 and site finishing will wrap this year But the Drayto Dam is not the only lowhead dam to be replaced.

"Of the 77 major barriers around the Red River basin to fish movement - and that's on the main stem and the Minnesota side

- we have removed or modified 48 of those, so that's an incredibly aggressive clearance rate. And we're seeing good response from the fishery," Kludt notes.

The dividends paid in terms of fishery improvement are nearly immediate as well. Beyond the removal of the barrier, new fastflowing rocky and gravel areas are created over the naturally steep areas of the flows where these dams were previously installed. The new navigable structures and the rapids they create provide ideal spawning habitat for sturgeon and many other species in the Red River, often in the spring after their implementation.

"As far as the sturgeon response to the projects themselves, yeah, we do see sturgeon in those projects in the spring using it to spawn, and they're actually about the third wave of fish to move in and spawn," Kludt details, adding that seasonally, walleyes and suckers spawn first in the restored areas, before the sturgeon, evidencing a diverse benefit from the changes across multiple species.

Plans for more dam removal in tributary rivers along the Red River will continue into the future, with efforts by the NDG&F and others to remove the lowhead in Pembina on tap, which will open hundreds of miles of the Pembina River through North Dakota and Canada to lake sturgeon currently being stocked in the flow.
